Smoke Jumpers needed for 2022

If you've ever wanted a job that will push you to the absolute limit, the BC Wildfire Service might have an opening for you.

The provincial wildfire agency is hiring smokejumpers – front-line firefighters who parachute into remote fire zones, where they work unsupported sometimes for weeks at a time. The BC Wildfire Service employs about 70 smokejumpers every season, operating out of bases in Fort St. John and Mackenzie.

Using airplanes, the service can get crews deep into remote areas of B.C.'s vast wildlands that may not be accessible by road or helicopter. All of B.C.'s smokejumpers have at least one year of previous wildfire-fighting experience, though for many the job is their first time jumping out of a plane.

The province hires five to 15 new jumpers every year, who undergo five weeks of parachute training in the spring before being assigned to a crew. Beyond the jumping aspect, candidates must be extremely fit and be willing to spend days or weeks in the backcountry carrying their own gear, sometimes over mountains.

"We're looking for people who have a good understanding of their motives for why they want to do it, folks with an understanding that it is a service job and it does demand a lot of you, and people who are really comfortable in the bush and the wilderness and comfortable being pushed."
